WING WA LEE,

Petitioner,

v.

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION SERVICE,

Respondent.

RESPONDENT'S BRIEF

JURISDICTION

The petitioner is a native and citizen of the Republic of China, about 38 years of age. He last entered the United States at Los Angeles, California, on or about September 30, 1962 as a nonimmigrant crewman authorized to remain in the United States in such status for the period of time his vessel remained in port, in no event to exceed 29 days. He failed to depart with his ship, and remained in the United States beyond the period authorized. Deportation proceedings were instituted against him on April 5, 1963. Deportability on the charge states was conceded, and he was found deportable under Section 241 (a)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, in that after admission as a nonimmigrant under Section 101(a)(15) of the Act, he remained in the United States for a longer period of time than permitted. He was ordered deported to the Republic of China (in Formosa) or in the alternative to Macao.

No appeal was taken, and the order became final. Respondent was unable to effect deportation to either place, and therefore moved to reopen the proceedings for an order for his deportation to Hong Kong. The motion was granted, and on May 19, 1965, the Special Inquiry Officer ordered deportation of petitioner to Hong Kong. An appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals was dismissed on July 29, 1965.

On October 3, 1965, Congress amended the Immigration and Nationality Act by Public Law 89-236, particularly Section 203(a)(7) (8 USC 1153(a)(7)). Petitioner attempted to file an application under Section 203(a)(7), and moved the Board of Immigration Appeals to reopen the proceeding. The motion was denied by the Board of Immigration Appeals on the ground that petitioner was ineligible.

Petitioner invokes the jurisdiction of this Court under Section 106(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 USC 1105(a)). He does not contest the original deportation order, but challenges only the denial of his motion to reopen the deportation proceedings.

Respondent concedes jurisdiction under Section 106(a). Although the petition for review was filed more than six months after the original deportation order, it was timely with respect to the Order of the Board of Immigration Appeals of June 1, 1966.

Bregman v. INS, 9 Cir.
351 F.2d 401

The attention of the Court is called to the case of Tai Mui v. Esperdy in the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit (Docket No. 30621, Calendar No. 133). On an identical factual situation the case reached the Court of Appeals via a summary judgment in a declaratory judgment action in the District Court. The appellant had sought and was denied a stay of deportation from the District Director, in order to prosecute an application for adjustment of status under Section 203(a)(7) of the ground that as a crewman he was ineligible.

Several other cases of aliens seeking the same relief are pending in the Second Circuit, on petitions to review under Section 106(a).^{1/}

QUESTION PRESENTED

Is petitioner eligible for relief under Section 203(a)(7) of the Act?

ARGUMENT

Respondent presents the same argument to this Court as has been presented to the Second Circuit in the mentioned cases, particularly Tai Mui v. Esperdy and Woo Cheng Wa v. INS.

The Board of Immigration Appeals properly denied petitioner's motion to afford him an opportunity to apply for adjustment of status under Section 203(a)(7) of the Immigration and Nationality Act for which petitioner was statutorily ineligible.

This subsection was amended to add the last two sentences.
31 F.R. 536, January 15, 1966.

Petitioner contends that Section 245 of the Act does not apply to him, and that Section 203(a)(7) contains no bar against crewmen. He contends that 8 CFR 245.1 and 245.4, the regulations which exclude crewmen, are an unauthorized limitation on the operation of Section 203(a)(7).

The motion to reopen was denied on the ground that an alien who enters as a crewman is not eligible for adjustment of status under Section 203(a)(7).

Section 203 provides for the allocation of 170,000 immigrant visas each fiscal year, 1/ among seven preference classes. Aliens who have close relatives in the United States qualify for 74% of the visas under the first, second, fourth, and fifth preferences. Members of the professions come within the third preference, which is allocated 10% of the visas. Another 10% is allocated under the sixth preference to aliens capable of performing skilled or unskilled labor for which there is a shortage of qualified workers in the United States. These preferences, which were revised by the Act of October 3, 1965, 79 Stat. 911, represent a continuation of a system of preferences which had been in effect under prior law, although the first six preferences in their present form are broader in scope than their predecessors. 2/

The remaining 6% of the available numbers is allocated to the seventh preference, which is described in Section 203 (a)(7). This subsection provides for the issuance of "conditional entries" to aliens who may be broadly classified as refugees,

2/ Section 6 of the Act of May 26, 1924, 43 Stat. 155, provided preferences based on relationship of the immigrant to citizens or alien residents.

Section 203 of the Act, as originally enacted, Act of June 27, 1952, 66 Stat. 178, allocated the visas on the basis of skills, (first preference, 50%) and relationship" (second preference, 30%, third preference, 20%). Visas unused by the first three preferences became available for non-preference immigrants, with 25% reserved for a fourth preference on the basis of relationship. The Act of September 22, 1959, 71 Stat. 639 changed the composition of the second, third and fourth preference classes slightly.

from a communist or communist-dominated country, or from a designated area in the Middle East, who because of fear of persecution are unwilling or unable to return to the country from whence they came and who are not nationals of the country or area in which they make their application. This part of Section 205(a)(7) is a "codification of a previous practice under which aliens, usually refugees, were 'paroled' into the United States under various emergency legislative or executive provisions." In including this new provision as a permanent part of the Immigration Act, Congress continued an immigration policy which has existed since the close of World War II, whereby the United States has participated in the worldwide resettlement of refugees. See Senate Report 748, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 16; House Report 745, 89th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 15. As the Committee Reports indicate, Congress adopted the term "conditional entry" in order to avoid the unfavorable connotation of the term parole, which had been used under the Fair Share Refugee Act, Act of July 14, 1960, 74th Stat. 504. As further indicated in the reports, it was contemplated that the "conditional entry" procedure, in force under the prior temporary legislation, would be virtually the same under the new law. Thus, Section 203(g) and (h), 8 USC (1964 Ed. Supp. I) Sections 1153(g) and (h), are a codification of the procedure in effect under the Fair Share Refugee Act.

Section 203(a)(7), in addition to providing for the issuance of "conditional entries", includes the proviso that:

"immigrant visas in a number not exceeding one-half the number specified in this paragraph may be made available, in lieu of conditional entries of a like number, to such aliens who have been continuously physically present in the United States for a period of at least two years prior to application for adjustment of status."
[Emphasis supplied.]

The proviso thus provides for the issuance of "immigrant visas" to be used for "adjustment of status". The interrelation of the proviso and adjustment of status under Section 245 becomes apparent on examination of the terms of art employed in both Sections as well as the legislative history.

As Judge Levet points out in his decision: 3/

"The inclusion of the words 'adjustment of status' * * * [in Section 203(a)(7)] does no more than refer to the process of application; the presence of those words does not create any new substantive rights. Adjustment of status must still be carried out under Section 245. If there is any doubt that that was Congress' intention, one need only look at Senate Report 748, 89th Cong., 1st. Sess. 12 (1965) where it is said with regard to Section 203(a)(7) of the Act:

' * * * It is contemplated that such adjustment will be made under Section 245 of the Immigration and Nationality Act.'"

3/ Unreported decision in the United States District Court, S. D. New York, in Tai Mui v. Esperdy, 66 Civ. 316.

CONTENTS

While the statement of the congressional intention is quite specific and serves to demonstrate that the term of art, "adjustment of status" under the provisions of Section 245, there are other cogent reasons for so construing the section in this manner. As already shown Section 203(a)(7) first sets aside numbers which shall be made available for conditional entries. The subsection then provides that in lieu of "conditional entries", "immigrant visas" may be made available in a number not exceeding one-half of the total, for the adjustment of status of aliens who have been physically present in the United States for at least two years.

Section 245(a)(3) provides that one of the indispensable requisites for adjustment of status is that "an immigrant visa is immediately available to * * * [the alien] at the time his application is approved." Section 245 of the Act is the only section which requires that an alien have an immigrant visa immediately available in order to adjust status.

The other provisions of the Act, Sections 244 and 249, 8 USC Sections 1254 and 1259, which provide for adjustment of status by aliens in the United States, do not require that an immigrant visa be immediately available. Thus, even in the absence of the express declaration in the Senate Report concerning the applicability of Section 245, the procedures provided within the Act indicate that adjustment is governed by Section 245, since only that section has the immigrant visa requirement.

Recapitulating then, we find Congress enacted a permanent provision concerning refugees. For refugees outside the country, Congress provided conditional entries together with procedural provisions which had not previously been an integral part of the Act. For refugees who have been in the United States for more than two years, Congress allocated immigrant visas for adjustment of status. No new procedural provisions were needed since Section 245 was already a part of the basic Act.

We come then to appellant's contention that since Section 203(a)(7) does not, by its specific terms, bar a crewman, he should not be barred by the limitations imposed under Section 245. The Attorney General has provided in 8 CFR 245.4 that an alien seeking to adjust status as a refugee, must do so in accordance with the provisions of Section 245. Accordingly, the Board of Immigration Appeals concluded that a crewman may not adjust his status, even assuming he could otherwise qualify as a refugee, since crewmen are specifically barred from adjustment under Section 245. Similarly, an alien who entered the United States without inspection would be barred, since such an alien does not meet the requirements of Section 245.

The Court will note that Congress amended Section 244 of the Immigration and Nationality Act by Section 12(b) of the Act of October 3, 1965, which reopened the benefits of that provision to crewmen who entered the United States prior to July 1, 1964. While this amendment indicates some disposition on the part of Congress to moderate a policy which had theretofore barred crewmen from any adjustment of status, it is significant that the absolute bar of Section 245 was retained.

The restrictive policy toward crewmen had initially been reflected in Section 10 of the Act of July 14, 1960, 74 Stat. 504, which excluded crewmen from adjustment under Section 245. See Fassilis v. Esperdy, 301 F.2d 429 (2d Cir. 1962). Still later, this congressional policy was extended to suspension under Section 244 by Section 4 of the Act of October 24, 1962. See Foti v. INS, 332 F.2d 424 (2d Cir. 1964).

Moreover, and again significantly, in the course of the legislative process which ultimately resulted in the 1965 Act, Congressman Feighan, the Chairman of the House Committee, had introduced his own bill, H.R. 8662, which would have removed the crewmen exclusion from Section 245. This proposal was rejected and did not appear in the bill, as finally enacted. In an address this June to the annual convention of the Association of Immigration and Nationality Lawyers, Congressman Feighan stated:

"Other provisions of my bill which were subsequently modified were the advancement of the registry date to December 24, 1952 (the final bill cut it back to 1948); the eligibility for suspension of deportation of any alien regardless of the manner of his entry or the place from which he came (the final bill continued ineligibility for exchange aliens and natives of contiguous territory and adjacent islands); and the eligibility for Section 245 adjustment for those who entered as crewmen (the final bill barred crewmen, including potential 203(a)(7) refugees, from that privilege)."
[Emphasis added.]"

Against this background, the conclusion is inevitable that Congress, aware of the restrictions of Section 245, nevertheless limited the scope of the proviso to Section 203(a)(7) by withholding adjustment from crewmen, and those who enter without inspection.

The speech appears at 112 Cong. Rec. 13958, 13959 (daily ed. June 29, 1966).

It is not enough that an alien be a refugee. In order to adjust his status he must meet all of the qualitative and quantitative standards, in addition to those of the refugee. Those standards include the mode of admission under Section 245.

CONCLUSION

The decision of the Board of Immigration Appeals should be affirmed.
